Desultory Reading.

O finest essence of delicious rest!
To bid for some short space the busy mill
Of anxious, ever-grin ing thought be still;
And let the weary brain and throbbing breast
Be by another's cooling haud caressed.
This volume in my hand, I hold a charm
Which lifts me out of reach of wrong or harm.
I sail away from trouble; and, most blessed
Of every blessing, can myself forget:
Can rise above the instance low and poor
Into the mighty law that governs yet.
This hinged cover, like a well,hung door,
Shuts out the noises of the jangling day,
These fair leaves fan unwelcome thoughts away,

LITERARY NOTES.

The Need of an American Literature.

Mr. Alexander C. McClurg, the well-known publisher of Chicago, has an admirable article in the May number of The Dial, entitled Justice to Authors. It is an earnest and logical plea for international copyright. We quote what Mr. McClurg has to say in regard to the depressing influence of the present system on American literature:

"So far as new authors are concerned, we may almost ask in our midst to-day the old question, 'Who reads an American book?' In fiction we pore over pictures of English society, we learn English ways and English slang, we think English thoughts, and live wearily over again the despairing lives of a society that has passed its prime. We discuss their troubles and disappointments, not our own hopes and possibilities. We waste time on problems which do not concern us, and have no discussion of those which open vitally on every side of us.

"In history we follow the guidance of English historians. We revel in the small details of the Saxon kings, and we experience a more thrilling interest in an episode in the 'Wars of the Roses,' or in a skirmish between Roundheads and Cavaliers, than we have ever felt in the most gallant battle of our Revolution, where, perhaps, our own rude forefathers, half armed, but strong sinewed in the sense of right, worsted the united soldiery of these two doughty factions.

"We are too well provided with that literature which concerns us not. It is in every library, in every home, in every shop, and in every railway car. The child reads it, the idler reads it, the thinker reads it. It is interesting; it has passed the ordeal of the critics; it is good literature; and it is cheap. What care we for the book of the American author? so the American author dies; or, rather, he is not born. The best authorship, like other good things, is of slow growth. It is the result of many efforts and many failures, of years of study and waiting. A few geniuses spring full armed into the field, but in the history of literature they are the exceptions. The first book is not, perhaps, brilliant, but it is good, and the author is encouraged to go on, and the result is a Byrant or a Longfellow, a Hawthorne or an Emerson.

"But in the America of to-day this tentative process has no encouragement. The cold wind of summary rejection sweeps down on the tender flowers hidden in the modest first manuscript, and they are withered, never to bloom again and bear fruit. It is the custom to-day of many, perhaps of most, of the American publishers to refuse even to read an original manuscript from an unknown American author. Of course, the publisher is governed by hard-headed business rules. His reasoning is this: To find one good manuscript he must read and reject many, a waste of time or money (for competent readers are expensive,) and, if he find a good one, it is more likely, if published, to bring loss than gain; and for these reasons: He must publish it at such a price as will give him back his expenditure in typesetting and electrotype plates on a moderate sale, for the book being by an untried author, even though an excellent book, he cannot surely count upon a large sale, while the man who reprints without pay the book of an English author of established reputation can fix upon it a low price upon the certainty of a large and continuous sale. And while the reputation of the English book and author is already made and needs no considerable outlay in advertising, the publisher of a new American book cannot be certain that even a very large expenditure in advertising it will result in anything but increased loss.

"And, besides all this, he must, of course, if the author is to derive any benefit from it, pay to the American author a royality on each copy sold, while nothing is paid for the English book. In other words, of the American book he can not risk a large edition, while the sale of very large editions of the English work is certain; he must incur an extra large expense in advertising the one, while the other is already made famous, and he must pay the author royalty upon the former, while the latter costs nothing.

Is not the logic of the situation clearly and convincingly against the American book? Of course, the publisher says to himself, it is better that I read no American manuscripts, for, if I do, I may like them, and may weakly publish them. This is no exaggeration of the reasoning and the practice of most American publishers to-day. Only a few days since, a prominent Boston publisher testified before a committee of Congress that for two years he has not read an American manuscript.

"With this state of affairs, what becomes of American authorship? How can we have an American literature? Mr. Howells has just said that 'Mr. T. W. Higginson has gone far to make us believe with him that our national story (history) is more important, more varied, more picturesque, and more absorbingly interesting than any historic subject offered by the world beside.' But just as we have done in the past, we are likely to go on in the future, reading Hume and Macaulay and Gibbon, and Green, and Guizot, and learning every history but our own, but it is cheaper so to do. We shall go on thinking not our own but Englishmen's thoughts, discussing not our own but Englishmen's topics, seeing life and the world through insular glasses and narrowing ourselves through insular prejudice. Can we afford to live on this cheap food meant for men of another continent, and of a fading era, and not intended for us whose nation and form of government belong emphatically to the present and to the untried future?"

Vicinity Notes.

ORANGE.

Four of the five members of the Orange Board of Health met in the office of Secretary Stetson Wednesday night. The health ordinance was taken up on its second reading and passed. Health Inspector Dr. Buttner made a report of his investigation into the methods adopted by the East Orange authorities for deodorizing night soil placed on their poor farm. Dr. Buttner gave a detailed account of the method, and, after some discussion, it was decided to first obtain the consent of the Common Council, and then make arrangements at the Orange Poor Farm for the treatment of night soil, scavengers to be given permission to dump on the farm. It was decided to make the usual inspection of the city by wards, and to request the Common Council to compel physicians and midwives to make more regular returns of births and deaths.

Gustave Klein, a barber doing business on Main street near Canfield, Orange, will shortly begin action against an Orange hatter for having urged people to boycott him. Klein says that a few weeks ago he was brought before the Barbers' Union, of Orange, and charged with keeping open after 8 o'clock one evening, contrary to the rules of the association. He denied the charge, but a fine of $5 was imposed upon him. He said at the time that he could prove by two men who were then in his place that he closed at 8 o'clock precisely. He then had his shop on Cone street near Main. After waiting several days, and being unable to find the men he paid the fine and was reinstated in the union. While he was under the ban, a hatter, whose name he has not yet ascertained, stood in front of his shop and prevented customers from entering. Klein further says that he produced the two men who were in his shop and demanded the return of his fine, which was refused him. He has now determined to obtain the name of the hatter who boycotted him and to bring action.

The contract for macadamizing Hillyer street was awarded to Thomas Nevins. The resolution to open Walnut street, from Main to Orange street, was adopted, and Messrs. T. C. Munn, B. F. Cairns and J. M. Taylor were appointed commissioners to assess the damages and benefits for the work. A resolution offered by Mr. Wiley was adopted creating the office of Township Engineer and appointing W. H. N. Reimer to that office.

The Fire Committee presented a deed of the property purchased on Main street, for the new house for the Ashland fire companies, plans for the building of which were accepted, and the committee were authorized to advertise for bids for the erection of a brick building in accordance with the plan. The Clerk presented a list of thirty-three members of Ashland Truck Company who had served seven years and were entitled to be recorded as Exempt Firemen.

James F. Wall, of Brooklyn, who was killed at Summit, on the Morris and Essex Railroad on Monday evening, had been sitting on the ties on a vacant track, to cool himself, when the "Chatham" drill engine sent several empty cars on a siding. Before the brakeman could stop them in their run on the decline, they collided with stationary cars, and one was thrown down the embankment, falling upon Wall. He was buried beneath, but gave a wild shriek, and men ran to his rescue. He only lived five minutes after the disaster.

State Items.

The Newton Presbytery has granted the petition for a Presbyterian church at Beattytown, this State.

Almost all of the many victims of the Pottersville church poisonlng have recovered, or are in a fair way of doing so.

The watch factory property at Marion, which has lain idle so many years, has passed into the hands of the N. Y. Knitting Company.

The Rev. Walter Hughson, of East Orange, recently licensed to preach by Bishop Starkey, will preach his first sermon in Christ Church, East Orange next Sunday.

The railroad which extends from the Tuckerton Railroad, at Manahawkin, across Barnegat Bay to Barnegat City Junction, a distance of five miles, was formally opened Monday.

Julius H. Pratt, of Montclair, Class of '82, has been reappointed to the Stillman Fellowship at Yale College. A son of William Walter Phelps composed the parting ode for the graduates.

A tramp attacked a farmer's wife near Plumsack, Sussex county. A bulldog belonging to her husband drove him off with severe injuries, but the brave animal lost its own life in the struggle.

Seven counties will elect State Senators this Fall. They are Atlantic, Cumberland, Morris, Ocean, Bergen, Hudson and Mercer. The first four counties are now represented by Republicans and the last three by Democrats.

The steamer Richard Stockton will not run between Jersey City and West Point and Newburg in connection with the Pennsylvania Railroad this year. The company has chartered the Cygnus from the Iron Steamboat Company, which will take the Stockton's place. The first excursion took place on Thursday, July 8th.

The Belvidere Iron Mines, some years ago abandoned, have been reopened by a company of New York capitalists, the water pumped out, and the work of raising ore recommenced. A shaft sunk by the company on leased lands adjoining has developed a bed of ore of desirable quality for conversion into Bessemer steel.

The Rev. Henry Vehslage, of the Irvington Reformed Church, has been made a Doctor of Divinity by Rutgers College. The college has not conferred the honor more wisely, and none have deserved it more than Mr. Vehslage, whose labors, if quietly performed, have been none the less distinguished for earnestness and effectiveness within his field.

The Camden Courier thinks there is no necessity for an early State Convention this year. Things will settle by waiting, and we can get a clearer view of the situation after the Democrats make their nominations. As they are about the only people who are now trying to precipitate the circus, let them furnish the music and the clowns.

General Clinton B. Fisk, the Prohibition candidate for Governor, is preparing for the campaign in earnest. The Prohibitionists propose holding a series of gigantic mass meetings throughout the State, and General Fisk contemplates bringing the Jubilee Singers from the Fisk University, at Nashville. An effort is being made to draw most of the clergymen of the State into the canvass and have them make speeches.
